Adani group denies environmental breach claims

REUTERS
Mumbai, 21 March

The Adani group is battling allegations in court that its planned multibillion-dollar power plant and a luxury housing complex breach environment laws, adding to its many legal headaches.

Such allegations have often troubled Adani projects in India and abroad. In Australia, the group battled a seven-year activist campaign against its Carmichael coal mine, and construction at its seaport in south India was halted for months in 2022 due to protests over coast erosion.

Now, Adani Group is defending itself against allegations made in the National Green Tribunal that it started work on a $2 billion power plant without waiting for environmental clearance. This case is set for a hearing on Friday.

The lawsuit by an activist says the site for the plant is within a forest in the Mirzapur district of Uttar Pradesh. The suit seeks to halt the project saying it would devastate the area and impact wildlife, court papers show.

Adani denied in a March 6 filing that any of its activities at the site are environmentally damaging. "The project land is not a forest land," Adani also said in the filing.

State pollution control official Reetesh Kumar Tewari told Reuters that Adani stopped work at the site after it was sent a November warning notice about the construction.

Adani Group did not respond to an e-mail seeking comment.

Debadityo Sinha, the activist who filed the lawsuit, declined comment citing ongoing legal proceedings.

Legal cases in India can drag on for years, and environment-related challenges often emerge as a sticking point for big companies.

Adani fights environmental allegations over key projects

TGG NETWORK

MUMBAI

Indian billionaire Gautam Adani's conglomerate is currently facing legal challenges over two major projects: a proposed multibillion-dollar power plant and a luxury housing development. The group is accused of violating environmental laws, adding to its ongoing legal battles.

Adani projects have frequently faced environmental opposition both in India and abroad. In Australia, the company endured a seven-year activist campaign against its Carmichael coal mine. In 2022, construction at its south Indian seaport faced delays following protests linked to coastal erosion.

Now, the Adani Group is contesting claims in India's National Green Tribunal, where it stands accused of initiating work on a $2 billion power plant without securing prior environmental clearance. The case is scheduled for a hearing this Friday.

According to court documents, an activist's lawsuit claims the proposed plant site is located in a forested area in Uttar Pradesh's

Mirzapur district. The suit demands the project's suspension, arguing it poses severe environmental risks and threatens local wildlife.

In response, Adani denied in a March 6 filing that any of its actions had harmed the environment. "The project land is not a forest land," the company stated.

Reetesh Kumar Tewari, an official from the state pollution control board, informed Reuters that Adani ceased construction at the site after receiving a warning notice in November.

The Adani Group did not respond to email inquiries

ing significant obstacles for large corporations.

LEGAL PRESSURE AND INTERNATIONAL SCRUTINY

This latest dispute arises alongside another legal development involving Gautam Adani himself. The Indian government has recently requested a local court to serve a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission summons to Adani regarding an alleged $265 million bribery scheme. Adani has denied these allegations, calling them "baseless."

LUXURY HOUSING AND SLUM REDEVELOPMENT IN MUMBAI

Adani is also facing environmental challenges regarding two major Mumbai projects, one of the world's most expensive real estate markets.

A luxury residential project in Bandra is being contested by activist Zoru Bhatena and a local residents' group. Their lawsuit, currently before Mumbai's high court, argues that Adani's proposed construction site was reclaimed from the sea and remains a legally protected coastal zone where development is prohibited.

In court filings, India's environment ministry and the Adani Group have argued that the site is no longer classified as protected following a 2019 rule change.

The high court has characterized the Bandra case as a "vital issue relating to environmental protection," with the next hearing set for March 27.

In addition, Adani's ambitious Dharavi slum redevelopment project is facing opposition. The company, now operating as Navbharat Mega Developers, secured the project through a $619 million redevelopment bid two years ago. Dharavi, which spans three-quarters the size of New York's Central Park and houses around one million people, is known for its dense population and challenging living conditions.

In September, Adani's company was granted 256 acres (104 hectares) of salt-pan land to construct rental housing for Dharavi residents. However, activist lawyer Sagar Devre has filed a public interest litigation in the Mumbai high court against Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government.

Adani fights environmental allegations over key projects

TGG NETWORK
MUMBAI

Indian billionaire Gautam Adani's conglomerate is currently facing legal challenges over two major projects: a proposed multibillion-dollar power plant and a luxury housing development. The group is accused of violating environmental laws, adding to its ongoing legal battles.

Adani projects have frequently faced environmental opposition both in India and abroad. In Australia, the company endured a seven-year activist campaign against its Carmichael coal mine. In 2022, construction at its south Indian seaport faced delays following protests linked to coastal erosion.

Now, the Adani Group is contesting claims in India's National Green Tribunal, where it stands accused of initiating work on a $2 billion power plant without securing prior environmental clearance. The case is scheduled for a hearing this Friday.

According to court documents, an activist's lawsuit claims the proposed plant site is located in a forested area in Uttar Pradesh's

Mirzapur district. The suit demands the project's suspension, arguing it poses severe environmental risks and threatens local wildlife.

In response, Adani denied in a March 6 filing that any of its actions had harmed the environment. "The project land is not a forest land," the company stated.

Reetesh Kumar Tewari, an official from the state pollution control board, informed Reuters that Adani ceased construction at the site after receiving a warning notice in November.

The Adani Group did not respond to email inquiries seeking comment. Activist Debadebityo Sinha, who filed the lawsuit, declined to comment due to ongoing legal proceedings.

Environmental cases in India are known to extend for years, frequently becoming significant obstacles for large corporations.

LEGAL PRESSURE AND INTERNATIONAL SCRUTINY

This latest dispute arises alongside another legal development involving Gautam Adani himself. The Indian government has recently requested a local court to serve a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission summons to Adani regarding an alleged $265 million bribery scheme. Adani has denied these allegations, calling them "baseless."

LUXURY HOUSING AND SLUM REDEVELOPMENT IN MUMBAI

Adani is also facing environmental challenges regarding two major Mumbai projects, one of the world's most expensive real estate markets.

A luxury residential project in Bandra is being contested by activist Zoru Bhatena and a local residents' group. Their lawsuit, currently before Mumbai's high court, argues that Adani's proposed construction site was reclaimed from the sea and remains a legally protected coastal zone where development is prohibited.

In court filings, India's environment ministry and the Adani Group have argued that the site is no longer classified as protected following a 2019 rule change.

The high court has characterized the Bandra case as a "vital issue relating to environmental protection," with the next hearing set for March 27.

In addition, Adani's ambitious Dharavi slum redevelopment project is facing opposition. The company, now operating as Navbharat Mega Developers, secured the project through a $619 million redevelopment bid two years ago. Dharavi, which spans three-quarters the size of New York's Central Park and houses around one million people, is known for its dense population and challenging living conditions.

In September, Adani's company was granted 256 acres (104 hectares) of salt-pan land to construct rental housing for Dharavi residents. However, activist lawyer Sagar Devre has filed a public interest litigation in the Mumbai high court against Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government.

The Adani group is battling allegations in court that its planned multibillion-dollar power plant and a luxury housing complex breach environment laws, adding to its many legal headaches.

Such allegations have often troubled Adani projects in India and abroad. In Australia, the group battled a seven-year activist campaign against its Carmichael coal mine, and construction at its seaport in south India was halted for months in 2022 due to protests over coast erosion.

Now, Adani Group is defending itself against allegations made in the National Green Tribunal that it started work on a $2 billion power plant without waiting for environmental clearance. This case is set for a hearing on Friday.

The lawsuit by an activist says the site for the plant is within a forest in the Mirzapur district of Uttar Pradesh. The suit seeks to halt the project saying it would devastate the area and impact wildlife, court papers show.

Adani denied in a March 6 filing that any of its activities at the site are environmentally damaging. "The project land is not a forest land," Adani also said in the filing.

State pollution control official Reetesh Kumar Tewari told Reuters that Adani stopped work at the site after it was sent a November warning notice about the construction.

Adani Group did not respond to an e-mail seeking comment.

Debadityo Sinha, the activist who filed the lawsuit, declined comment citing ongoing legal proceedings.

Legal cases in India can drag on for years, and environment-related challenges often emerge as a sticking point for big companies.
